Writes in Bed, Wears Boots Outside His Trousers and Gauntlets for Gloves.

SARATOGA, August 18 .- Josquin Miller, the poet of the Sierras, joined his family at their cottage here three days to the races Saturday received this reply: 'Plane, plane," meaning, "Softly, softly,"

"Piano, piano," meaning, "Softly, softly,"
Most of the men here wear shining patent-leather shoes. The poet wears boots, some dark brown, some black, but all reaching to the knee. During the day he tucks his trousers into the boots; during the evening he wears his trousers outside of his boots.

The poet wears gauntlets instead of gloves. They are of chamols, fringed and slashed, and reach to the elbows.

Joaquin Miller, who writes in bed, did so long before Mark Twain. He begins to weave romance and write poetry after breakfast in bed at 8 A. M. and does not dress until noon, when dinner is served with his family. During the afternoon he goes driving. Supper time is 7 and the great poet relires at 10. He sees much of his beautiful little daughter, Juanita, throughout the day, from the time she carries him a dainty breakfast and fresh flowers until her sweet Sootch ballads just before bedtime.
